Forward: Developments in Policy Prosopography, 2010

Paul Rich
President, Policy Studies Organization

This is the second edition of the Public Policy Yearbook, fathered by Professor Hank Jenkins-Smith, and this year being distributed both as a special issue of the Policy Studies Journal and as a stand-alone volume for reference collections.

A yearbook ideally should have something to say about current topics and indeed there are important developments in policy scholarship that deserve mention. If I were asked to single out one, it would be the impact of the Internet and web on policy research and teaching. In fact, the Yearbook is made possible by the new technology.

Of course, all scholarship is being impacted by technology. However, policy studies by their nature are more contemporary than some other disciplines. This is not to say that there aren’t constant developments in Shakespeare studies or research into the Egyptian Middle Kingdom, and in fact one of the challenges in teaching is to convince students that there is no such thing as static knowledge. History and literature are not fossilized.

However, one way to view policy is as knowledge brought to action, academia working with the hope of change and improvement in society. Most policy students would agree that much of the time policy discourse has a contemporary flavor. So inevitably the ability of the new technology to provide information more rapidly does have a special impact on policy.

All eleven journals of the Policy Studies Organization are available online, and the online versions appear before the paper versions can make their way through the mail. Increasingly, libraries prefer the electronic versions because they can have multiple readers and are not on lost in the post. Librarians tell me that on a large campus, a single paper copy is a frustration to both faculty and students. Every year despite a very small difference in price we find more libraries opt for the electronic only version of the journals.

Inevitably this new media will change the way in which scholars write. Graphs and charts, video clips, color photographs—these formerly either expensive or impossible amplifications are now becoming easier and less costly. It has to be conceded that articles still do not reflect the versatility that the web permits. It may be that some older scholars simply don’t feel comfortable working in the new world, and that we shall have to wait for more use of the web before the balance tips and the numbers prevail of those who, because of age, grew up with computers. The issue is not simple word processing but the whole style of writing permitted by computer innovation. We simply cannot estimate what Google Voice, Chrome, Android, the Espresso Book Machine and other innovations of 2010 are going to do for us or to us. Cloud computing and YouTube seem tame compared to what might be around the corner.

What can be said is that it is reasonable to expect the changes of the last ten years to be minor compared to the changes of the next ten years. Many academic units still advise newly minted professors to write books for tenure, but how long will that continue. We still regard journal articles as the Swiss francs of the tertiary world, but is that a currency in danger of becoming obsolescent?

Many of us find these frontiers to be challenging but not threatening. And the Yearbook is an example of how the activities of scholars are being favorably influenced by electronics. The authorities listed in this year’s volume are geographically diverse band, with amazingly varied interests. A generation ago, knowing about their work and being able to contact them would have been a major challenge. Now, if you are searching for advice or a cohort, the Yearbook permits you in a few minutes to reach around the world to a colleague and companion enthusiast. Do you need a teacher to fill a sabbatical hole, or summer institute faculty, or a peer reviewer? Well, here is a source.

Knowing the ingenuity of Hank Jenkins-Smith, I have no doubt that the Yearbook will always be a work in progress. It certainly has already been tremendously useful. Let me suggest a way in which we will find it useful that perhaps has not been appreciated—as a running history of policy studies, as in a sense prosopography.

Prosopography, which is in some respects collective biography, is closely associated with the problems of causality and the way a profession or discipline is shaped by individuals. Categories are created by prosopographers and can elicit characteristics and attitudes from a group who were Puseyites or Rotarians, or attended Oxford, or that all came from Devon, or in this case are policy mavens—the implications can be explored.

At the heart of successful prosopography is finding an accurate list of the members of a group, one that is as inclusive as possible, as it will be difficult in the middle or the end of a study to go back and look for information for those that were missed. As Professor Jenkins-Smith develops the Yearbook his criteria for selection of entries will become increasingly of interest. Sherlock Holmes in The Red-Haired League (1892) was a tongue-in-cheek prosopographer when he remarked, “Beyond the obvious fact that he has at some time done manual labor, that he takes snuff, that he is a Freemason, and that he has been in China, and that he has done a considerable amount of writing lately, I can deduce nothing else.”

Sir Lewis Namier (1888–1960) in The Structure of Politics at the Accession of George III (1929) and other work on British parliamentarians demonstrated the technique’s effectiveness. Of course, there are dangers as prosopography’s proponents often have been attacked for claiming too much on basis of the study of too small a selection. The inherent problem is that successful prosopography is necessarily limited in the size of group that can be studied. The selection can be nonrepresentative and too small, but on the other hand biographical analysis of large groups not only requires enormous resources but often is inconclusive. One of the best uses of prosopography is for the study of a special group such as the members of a legislature or club. A good example is R. Neale’s Class and Ideology in the Nineteenth Century (1972) that examined the governors and executive councilors of the Australian colonies in 1788–1856.

The Yearbook is an ideal base for prosopography. Since Namier’s time the technique has not featured as prominently in the mainstream of scholarship as it should. This neglect is unfortunate, because when the subject of study fits the criteria of not being too voluminous and of being fairly well documented, it is a highly successful research tool. The Yearbook is going to prove very significant to policy studies as it profiles policy scholars and practitioners. For the first time we can study those who create the subject. This is not the place to go into details, but it is an interesting subject—for controversies over the proper use of techniques see Gertrude Himmelfarb, The New History and the Old (1987); and David Fischer, Historians’ Fallacies (1970). A significant scholar who has successfully employed prosopography is R.S. Neale, History and Class (1983). Examples of the use of the technique would include David Potter, India’s Political Administrators, 1919–1983 (1986) and Robin Bidwell, ”The Political Residents of Aden”, Arabian Studies V, (1979).

I hope someone will take up the challenge that the Yearbook presents, invoking the time saving that computers now give us, and start to use the Yearbook’s to profile policy scholars. Whether they all like malt or are partisans of the New York Yankees, one is curious as to their principles and prejudices. How far Professor Jenkins-Smith personally chooses to go down the road traveled by Sir Lewis is of course his choice, and he has a number of important policy projects on his plate. But we are all most grateful to him for starting something of such worth as the yearbook.
2010 Public Policy Yearbook

This issue marks the second edition of the annual Public Policy Yearbook. As was the case in 2009, the 2010 edition of the Yearbook contains a detailed international listing of active public policy scholars, with contact information, fields of specialization, research references\(^1\) and a short statement of research interests for each scholar. Within the next few months, in addition to the annual hard-copy version, the Yearbook will be accessible online for review by those interested in identifying scholars by field and interest. The Yearbook is provided free of charge to members of the Policy Studies Organization and subscribers to the Policy Studies Journal, and is now available as a stand-alone volume.

The Yearbook is designed with several objectives in mind. The intent is to provide a resource for scholars and practitioners of public policy that will permit an accessible reference to who is studying what, where, and how in the field of public policy. The Yearbook is designed to be more than a “phonebook” listing of policy scholars and their programs. The design of the Yearbook permits scholars and practitioners to easily locate other scholars working in areas of theoretical and substantive interest, to identify the most pertinent and recent work published in these areas, and to provide a means to assess in what direction the research in these areas is going. To facilitate such uses the Yearbook database includes a field for each entry in which scholars were asked to detail the current and future directions of their research. This may be one of the greatest virtues of the Yearbook, as it allows young scholars to advertise their budding research agendas. It also allows those that have been in the game for some time to determine who is still doing research, and who needs to be prodded to get their game on. More generally, it provides the means to identify the broader community of public policy scholars—something that has been quite difficult to do heretofore.

Policy Scholarship Snapshots and Trends. The entries in the Yearbook, and the “current research” summaries in particular, provide a means to track current and over-time variations in the content and approaches to public policy scholarship. Once the Yearbook population reaches sufficient breadth the represent policy scholars generally\(^2\), shifts in substantive emphases (e.g., terrorism, climate change,\(^1\) Please note that while entries were reviewed for apparent errors, scholars’ publications are listed as the participating scholars provided them.

\(^2\) Currently the list of Yearbook entries over-represents policy scholars in political science departments, as would be expected given the initial reliance on the list of APSA Policy Section Members. But the second and subsequent editions will emphasize a broader population of scholars, but adding emphasis on those in public policy and public affairs schools.
immigration, or education) as well as theoretical and methodological approaches can be traced in the entries in the Yearbook over time. The data in the Yearbook with thus provide a basis for study of the evolution of public policy scholarship over time, and responses to specific events and trends. Figure 1 provides a simple but illuminating depiction of the frequency of primary words employed in the summaries of current research in the 2010 Yearbook.
Scholar Updates. In September of 2010, invitations will be sent to policy scholars to update their entries in the Yearbook. As in the past, the lists for invitations include all prior Yearbook scholars, active members of the APSA Public Policy Section and the membership of the Policy Studies Organization. In addition, we will include a link to the update file on the Policy Studies Organization webpage (www.ipsonet.org) inviting policy scholars to participate. Our intent is to continue to broaden participation in the Yearbook to ensure that it remains the most broadly representative source for current public policy scholarship.

As editors of the Policy Studies Journal, we are grateful to all of the respondents that took the time to respond to the many emails, and even the occasional phone call, encouraging them to submit or update their on-line entries for the 2010 Yearbook. Please brace yourselves: you will be hearing from us again next fall when we will ask that you update your entries for the 2011 Yearbook.

The design and production of the Yearbook was the product of many hands. We would like to thank Kelsey Martyn-Farewell for her capable assistance with the design, editing, and follow-up data collection. We also thank Matthew Henderson for the design and implementation of the online survey necessary for the data collection. We are deeply appreciative of the people at Wiley-Blackwell, and especially Joshua Gannon, Michael Riordan and Michael Streeter who, as always, were friendly and effective partners, and tolerated our production delays with (relatively) good humor. And, last but far from least, we grateful for the financial support and enthusiastic prodding provided by Dr. Paul Rich, President of the Policy Studies Organization.

Our hope is that you will find the 2010 Yearbook to be a useful resource in your work on public policy, and that you will continue to update your entries for publication in future issues. We apologize in advance for any errors that may have escaped our quality control processes. We will provide an opportunity for updates, corrections and new additions to the Yearbook in September of 2010.

Scott W. Allard is Associate Professor in the School of Social Service Administration at the University of Chicago. His primary research interests are in social welfare policy, poverty, and nonprofit organizations. To better understand the contours of social service provision in the U.S., a sector with about $200 billion in annual expenditures, he recently completed two surveys of more than 2,000 governmental and nonprofit social service providers in seven urban and rural communities. Complementing this work, Professor Allard has several projects exploring the changing geography of poverty in America and the evolution of the contemporary safety net.

I continue to focus primarily on issues of allocation and management in the National Wilderness Preservation System. A revised edition of my book, The Politics of Wilderness Preservation, was recently published by the University of Alaska Press, and I am nearing completion of a new book that focuses on the politics and policy of wilderness management. It will explore the legal framework for wilderness preservation in the United States, the implementation of that framework by four competing land management agencies, and issues raised by the effort to preserve natural conditions on public lands. Among the issue areas explored are questions of air quality and visibility; water resource allocation; fauna, flora and fire management; recreational regulation; and Native-American cultural accommodation. A new edition of my Encyclopedia of Environmental Issues is also forthcoming.

My current research centers on the breathtaking advances of new medical technologies in recent years which account for the increasing importance of medical technology regulation. Powerful political and economic interests sit on both sides of the negotiating table: the med-tech industry, trade associations and global device companies, as well as regulatory authorities and epistemic communities of experts who serve on advisory committees. While these stakeholder groups pursue their distinct interests, they constitute crucial elements of the medical-industrial complex.

I work on agenda-setting, policymaking processes, how issues are redefined through public debate, and I do so in the US national system and increasingly with a comparative focus. A recent book was published in 2008 and deals with how the death penalty in the US has been reframed around the concept of innocence and mistakes in the system, and how this is affecting public support and declining use of capital punishment. My most recent book appeared in 2009 concerns the efforts of lobbyists in Washington to reframe debates and shows the limits to their ability to do so. I co-direct, with Bryan Jones, the Policy Agendas Project (www.policyagendas.org) and am working with scholars in many other countries now to replicate the project in Canada, Europe, elsewhere, and for the state government of Pennsylvania (www.comparativeagendas.org). I also co-directed the lobbying and policy advocacy project (lobby.la.psu.edu) and am involved in efforts with colleagues in the US and Europe to extend this project internationally as well.

My earliest work in the policy field (Sigler and Beede, 1977) examined relationships between law and policy studies generally and discussed the role of law in respect to several specific policy areas, such as education and transportation. Over the past several years I have been collecting references to studies that make explicit comparisons between the development and implementation of public policies in the United States and in other countries. So far this review has not led to publication, but it is a continuing concern. I am interested generally in United States defense policy, and I have compiled or edited several reference books in the field. An important aspect of my interest in military affairs is the interface between military and police organizations within given countries. This topic has significant implications for civil/military relations, partly because this interface is likely to grow in importance as armed forces organized for traditional duties are employed increasingly in law enforcement.

I am currently working on several major research projects dealing with tax and social policy. In all these projects, I seek to explore broad theoretical issues such as the role of ideas and institutions in policy-making. For example, in April 2008, the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada (SSHRC) awarded me a Standard Research Grant to collaborate further with Professor Andre Lecours from Concordia University (Montreal). Our new interdisciplinary project is “Ideas, Interests, and Institutions: Fiscal Redistribution and Territorial Politics in Four Federal Systems.” This project focuses on the politics equalization policy in Australia, Canada, Spain and Switzerland. Additionally, I am working on a book project entitled “Reshaping American Social Policy?” that explores the role of ideas and institutions in contemporary American social policy. The co-author of this book is Alex Waddan from the University of Leicester.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
My main research interest is to understand how informal political and social arrangements increase the chance of successful collective action among organizational actors in fragmented policy systems. Primarily, my research agenda focuses on studying this issue in policy arenas developed to protect common-pool resources (like watersheds and fisheries). I currently concentrate my research efforts in finding out how informal policy networks are formed and how the structure they develop affects the relationship between the actors that compose the network. I study this issue in two different research sites. The first one is southwest Florida, where I’m analyzing how collaboration succeeds based on the patterns of participation in different projects designed to protect water quality and enhance natural habitats. The second research site is Argentina, where I’m studying ongoing efforts to prevent contamination in one of the major inter-jurisdictional river basins in the country.

I continue to have an interest in social policy, particularly work-family policies in the United States. However, I am researching different sources of individual gender-role attitudes in west and east (or “transitioning”) European countries. In particular, I am interested in the role played by historical, social and policy contextual factors. I am also beginning a new project examining possible work-family themes in the American co-housing and intentional community movements.

I am currently most interested in policy learning. In particular, following Lee Clarke’s idea that disaster plans are often fantasy documents, I believe that many post-disaster “lessons learned” documents are fantasy documents because no lessons are demonstrably learned. My goal in this research is to bridge my prior research on agenda setting with work on policy change, learning, failure, and implementation. I am also embarking on a long-term, large project that seeks to meld and improve upon the organizational learning and policy learning literatures to develop new theories of policy change.

This book focused on changes in governance arrangements in seven European countries. I am currently leading a comparative project on the Transformation of Universities in Europe funded by the European Science Foundation that studies the impact of policies on university organizations and higher education systems in eight European countries.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
The primary focus of my policy research has been woven around four subtexts: urban land use and economic development, globalization, public agency behavior, and policy consequences (agency performance, socioeconomic equity and environmental quality). To date, this work has been reported in five books, over two dozen referred journal articles, and numerous professional conference presentations. In the early period (1970–1985), my principal work was on corporate-inspired development of rural resort/recreation communities, and is best found in the book, Land Use Conflicts (University of Illinois Press, 1982) which examined alternative approaches to government policymaking in dealing with the consequences of rural transformations. In the mid 1980s, my research shifted to globalization and maritime trade. Its principal focus was on public entrepreneurial behavior during the “container revolution” at American seaports. The research is comprehensively reported in the book, Strategic Design and Organizational Change (University of Alabama Press, 1988). In the 1990s, my research interests shifted to urban infrastructure policy with a focus on regional public transit agencies. The research is found in the book, Social Class, Politics and Urban Markets (Stanford University Press, 2002), which examines agency policy outcomes and their consequences for different regional constituencies. It received the 2003 best book in public policy from the Academy of Management. My work since 2003 is on globalization and its value in differentiating American cities. The research is multi-faceted. First, given the inadequacy of “global city” definitions, the research has constructed a theory-driven profile of 7 dimensions to empirically discern global from less-global cities. Work on this has been reported internationally at conferences and is published in the January, 2008 issue of Urban Studies. Second, in work underway, the composite is being used both as a dependent variable dealing with socioeconomic and governmental antecedents of the global city and as an independent variable looking at global-city consequences (i.e., socioeconomic polarization, traffic congestion, environmental sustainability, culture and lifestyle).

Research focus is on the mixes of policy instruments for sustainable development in a networked governance context and the interaction processes between various actors that are influenced by such mixes. For analysing this a “contextual interaction theory” has been developed. In the second, I serve as Project Lead Investigator for Arm 4 of a larger project on Public Health Adaptive Systems Studies. Our research arm is developing an electronic dashboard for decision support to managers in public health systems. We are focusing on the interactions among three primary actors: hospitals, Health Departments, and emergency medical agencies. Both projects track the dynamic flow of information through organizations as they seek to coordinate their actions for common goals. With two colleagues, I have edited a book, Designing Resilience:
Preparedness for Extreme Events. University of Pittsburgh Press, forthcoming, May, 2010.

The current book I co-authored with Glen Sussman, namely, White House Politics and the Environment, that will soon be published by Texas A&M Press typifies what I have been working on for several years, namely, an examination of the American Presidency and social policy. This book examines the modern American presidency and its involvement with conservation and environmental politics and policy. Our book will look in depth at all the modern presidents since Franklin Roosevelt and how central an agenda item environmental policy has been for them. We will use a longitudinal approach for each president and period we look at, focusing on four basic factors of analysis or categories of evaluation involving 1) political communication, 2) legislative leadership, 3) administrative actions, and 4) environmental diplomacy. As to my future research, I would hope to examine the modern presidents and the global environment. Several publishers have exhibited an interest in this area.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
Specialized knowledge, including social scientific theory and research results, of course plays an important role in the formulation and evaluation of public policy. Yet skeptics advance weighty arguments as to how difficult it is to plan and engineer social change. It is often argued that attempts to do so will only make things worse. How, for example, can policy scientists deal with such problems as flawed theory, incomplete information, unintended consequence, and the openness of political systems? Are policy scientists merely servants of the people, or do they sometimes know better than the people what is in the public interest? Does the expertise of policy scientists give them any special authority as to the ethical aspects of policy formulation and evaluation? What about the bluntness, low responsiveness, and inefficiency of many of the instruments available to policy makers? What can be done about the problem there is not one single public interest, but many, often conflicting, public interests? My approach to such problems might be called “hopeful realism.” I approach the study of public policy critically and realistically. I take seriously the arguments of the skeptics, while retaining hope that policy science can learn systematically from experience, and can contribute to bringing about a better society. Looking at concrete policies, policy making processes, and attempts at various kinds of planning, I am interested in typical sources of policy failure, and typical conditions that appear to promote success. To be sure, there is no shortage of examples of bad policies. Yet in spite of all difficulties involved, it cannot be denied that there are countless examples of successful and partially-successful public policies. Difficulties are often formidable, risks often sobering, and success often only partial. Yet the historical record provides substantial grounds for hope of more successful public policy, and that policy science may learn to do better.

I am currently a Max Weber fellow at the European University Institute in Florence, Italy. I trained in political science at the University of Geneva and at the Institut dé Etudes Politiques, Grenoble, where I defended my PhD in 2007. Since 2007, I have been a lecturer at the Department of Political Science of the University of Geneva where I teach undergraduate advanced research seminars in political behaviour. Previously, I taught in comparative politics and social movements and research design at the University of Geneva and at the University of Lausanne. My dissertation, entitled, “Controversy, Decision and Reproductive Policies,” examines the extent to which public controversy on value-driven issues such as abortion and assisted reproductive technology leads to significantly different public policy making processes and outcomes. My research interests include comparative policy agendas, comparative public policies on morality issues such as euthanasia, stem cells research and same-sex marriage, gender dynamics in comparative electoral behavior as well as comparative methodology. I am currently involved in an international project on morality politics in a comparative perspective. This project constitutes the first systematic comparative study in politicization and policy-making on morality issues such as euthanasia, embryo and stem cells research, same-sex marriage, abortion and reproductive technologies across West European countries. Besides my Ph.D. dissertation, my work appears in Comparative European Politics, French Political Science Review, Swiss Political Science Review and in various books. I have recently co-edited a book on Gender and Public policy.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
My latest publication, Fight for the Bay: Why a Dark Green Environmental Awakening is Needed to Save the Chesapeake Bay, was published by Rowman and Littlefield in the fall of 2009. This work addresses the trend among environmental and natural resource policy makers to pursue environmental goals through voluntary programs, cooperative partnerships, and market-based solutions. The research project asks the central question, can voluntary environmental programs be counted on to address the pressing environmental problems of our day. The study argues that “new environmental politics,” which puts a premium on market-based solutions and voluntary programs, is well suited for resolving environmental conflict, but rarely produces the environmental benefits it seeks, and in many cases actually produces environmental harm. The work gives special attention to the Chesapeake Bay restoration effort and has chapters covering environmental ethics/philosophy, environmental management, environmental interest group politics, environmental science, and environmental journalism. The work builds on my previous research about the Chesapeake Bay restoration effort (Chesapeake Bay Blues: Science, Politics, and the Struggle to Save the Bay, published by Rowman and Littlefield, 2003). Chesapeake Bay Blues has been highlighted in numerous media outlets, including the Washington Post and National Public Radio’s Diane Rehm Show and resulted in invitations to testify before Congress and to guest lecture at numerous policy centers.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
My research investigates the creation, evolution and policy consequences of local governance arrangements and policy decisions through seven ongoing projects (http://localgov.fsu.edu): The Sustainable Energy and Governance Project investigates the adoption and diffusion of state and local energy and climate policy programs and initiatives and their environmental, energy and economic development consequences (http://seg.fsu.edu). The Regional Governance Project focuses on institutional collective action (ICA) and the formation, evolution, and performance of self-organizing collaboration in metropolitan areas. Current research employs social network analysis to model the formation of informal policy networks, interlocal agreements, regional districts, and regional partnership organizations as solutions to ICA problems. The Growth Management & Land Use Regulation Project develops a “political market” framework combining elements of political economy and property rights theories with work on local government structure. Current work includes surveys of city and county planning officials and a study of amendments to local land use plans. The Economic Development Project focuses on the roles of institutions, bargaining, and networks on economic development policy choices. Current research investigates development organization and policy choices, incentives, and collaborative joint ventures. The Boundary Project is focused on empirically testing explanations for boundary change based on collective action theory. Current research examines how institutions, incentives, and entrepreneurs influence annexation, municipal incorporation, charter schools, homeowner associations, special districts, and city county consolidations. The Local Institutions Project investigates the causes and consequences of local institutional change. Current work includes surveys of mayors and city managers motivations and career incentives, a study of the policy implications of turnover among local officials, and an investigation of how different forms of city and county government affect expenditure, taxation, and borrowing decisions. The Service Delivery Project is focused on empirically testing explanations for local service delivery arrangements based on theories of relational contracting and transaction costs. Current work examines the influence of political institutions and turnover on service delivery arrangement, interlocal service agreements, and the role on nonprofit organizations in delivering local services.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:

The focus of my research is the intersection between environmental ethics and decision-making processes that determine how societies manage resources and protect the environment. My research addresses: (a) water resources policy, (b) global environmental change/energy, (c) environmental risk, and (d) civil society and environmental ethics. A principal component is the conviction that disputes over water allocation, quality, and use are driven by divergent values held by governments, non-governmental groups, and citizens toward how, and whether, nature should be protected. I anchor this work on an adaptive management paradigm; an approach that promotes organizational designs to correct mistakes before they become irreversible, monitor change brought about by previous decisions, and instills the capacity to revise decisions in light of new information. My 2007 and 1995 books, Water Policy for Sustainable Development, and Water Resources Management: in Search of an Environmental Ethic examine the challenge of providing adequate freshwater to satisfy the needs of people and nature in different contexts. The first examined controversies over preservation of scenic rivers and regional development initiatives based on constructing large dams. Its major contribution was fusing classical political philosophy concerns over justice with efforts to resolve resource conflicts caused by excluding public participation and gratuitously viewing water projects as merely regional development projects. I have begun to examine the intersection between civil society and environmental reform. My focus is democratic reform in post-1991 Russia. While political scientists agree that civil society provides an outlet for freely articulating public policy demands; a forum for representing divergent points of view; and an autonomous platform for holding government accountable for its actions in Russia, a democratic civil society has never really existed. Bringing about reform requires a state that is accountable to NGO and citizen input, decision-makers popularly elected under the banners of competitive... political parties, and respect for consultation between agencies and NGOs. We are undertaking a survey of over 100 environmental NGO leaders to examine the roles of trust and confidence, political efficacy, and experiences with officials to examine these issues.

My work has been published in Publius: The Journal of Federalism, Polity, The Journal of Policy History, Policy Studies Journal, and Teachers College Record. Current projects examine state legislators’ response to successful initiatives using original web survey and case study data, the federalism implications of direct democracy, and variations in state and federal approaches to morality policies including drug control and gambling.

Marianne Franklin is Associate-Professor in Transnational Communications and Global Media at Goldsmiths. Her research is concerned with how information and communication technologies (ICTs), society, and politics collude with one another despite appearances to the contrary from the point of view of policy-making. With a background in the Social Sciences (International Relations) and the Humanities (History and Music) her past and current research looks at this dynamic in several ways. In no particular order these are i) struggles around the ownership and control of the Internet in public and private domains; (ii) postcolonial politics, everyday life, and cultures of ICT use; (iii) diasporic media and media diasporas; (iv) transnational social mobilization, multilateral institutions, and governance discourses; (v) critical theory and research on cyberspace, democracy, and gender-power relations; (vi) (popular) culture, world politics, and global media with particular reference to music. She has completed research with funding from the Social Science Research Council (USA) and the Ford Foundation. Given her background in the Humanities (History and Music) and the Social Sciences (International Studies) she is interested in developing socioculturally informed theories of media/Internet governance that are empirically grounded in research on past and current struggles around agenda-setting, access, uses and non-uses of emerging media and ICTs. In particular how these struggles are experienced and acted upon by, or on behalf of disadvantaged constituencies on-the-ground or on-line. Currently she is researching emerging transnational publics with respect to how social actors—civil society groups—participate in UN-brokered multilateral consultations at the intersection of Global Media Policy and Internet Governance. The Internet Governance Forum is the case in point. Alongside this ongoing research, she is an active member of the Internet Rights and Principles Dynamic Coalition at the Internet Governance Forum, series editor of Key Thinkers: Past and Present, appearing bi-annually in the journal Information, Communication and Society. At Goldsmiths she is Director of the Transnational Communications and Global Media postgraduate program. For more information on this program see http://www.goldsmiths.ac.uk/pg/ma-transnational-communications-global-media.php. Previous books include Postcolonial Politics, the Internet, and Everyday Life: Pacific Traversals Online (Routledge 2004), and Resounding International Relations: On Music, Culture, and Politics (Pagrave 2005). Forthcoming books include Understanding Methods: Coping with the Quantitative-Qualitative Divide, co-authored with Susan A. Banducci (Routledge 2010). Brian J. Gerber is an Associate Professor in the Public Administration Institute, Louisiana State University. His research specialization areas include disaster management, homeland security policy and administration, and regulatory policy. He has published articles in journals such as Public Administration Review, Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory, Political Research Quarterly, Policy Studies Journal, State Politics and Policy Quarterly, Public Finance and Management, Public Performance and Management Review and Urban Affairs Review. He has served as Research Director for the Stephenson Disaster Management Institute at LSU, has been a Research Associate with West Virginia University’s Regional Research Institute, was a Research Fellow with the National Science Foundation’s “Next Generation of Hazards Researchers” program, and has recently joined the Editorial Advisory Board for the Policy Studies Journal. Dr. Gerber has extensive experience performing policy analysis and evaluation work for state and local government agencies, including extensive work on evacuation management issues for the State of West Virginia and is currently leading several major assessment efforts for the National Voluntary Organizations Active in Disaster executive board. He has received external funding from, among others, the National Science Foundation and the U.S. Department of Education for projects examining topics such as local government variation in the implementation of national homeland security policy goals and the unique management needs experienced by persons with disabilities during disaster evacuations. These interests have led him to serve as a Co-Editor of the new journal Risk, Hazards and Crisis in Public Policy. Gerber holds a PhD in political science from Stony Brook University (SUNY).

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
Currently, I am working on a project entitled Philosophical Method, Philosophical-Policy & International Law from which I intend to produce three books. The first of these book is now in manuscript form as “The Genesis of International Law in Social Convention: An Application of David Hume’s Philosophical-Policy”. My basic thesis for the overall effort is that one can better understand the origin, persistence, and future course of international law by utilizing what I call the “Philosophical-Policy” of pre-positivist philosophers, specifically, in this case, Hume, Hegel, and Kant. By applying these whole, integrated philosophical systems constructed before the dialectic relationship of “positive” and “normative” was reduced, by positivism, to a dichotomy of independent, isolated concepts, I contend that we can better comprehend the true nature of international law as a response to the full complexity of humanity and our interaction with both the social and natural environments.
Overall, the ultimate argument in this project is for an “Ecological Contract” that acknowledges an increasingly complex system of global presuppositions created from the moral integrity of individuals, the functional integrity of nature, the collective action of societies, and the role of contextual governance structures.

Jeremy L. Hall, Ph.D. is a specialist in public policy and public management, with particular emphasis on economic development. His research has broken new ground in economic development measurement, recently developing a new index of state innovation capacity that accurately predicts patenting and economic growth at the state level. The capacity to innovate predisposes states to perform well in the knowledge-based economy, so measuring state capacity investments provides an improved method of assessing economic development planning and performance. Dr. Hall’s research extends to measuring public sector capacity and the linkage between capacity and performance. His work in the government capacity area considers the effects of local and regional administrative, financial and political capacity on federal grant receipts. This work highlights the importance of often overlooked regional institutions in governance outcomes—in this case economic development outcomes associated with federal funding. The use of best and evidence-based practice by public institutions is on the rise; Dr. Hall is following this trend closely and has responded with new research examining the use of evidence in public decision making practice. Recent research in this field has led Dr. Hall and his colleagues to develop a new rubric to guide public officials in their use of best and evidence-based practice information in policy decisions, specifically highlighting the role of risk and its association with necessary evidence levels. This work continues with the development of a national survey of state agencies’ to be launched in February 2008. The new survey will consider sources of evidence, how evidence is incorporated into the decision making process, and then will examine differences by agency type and by state in an attempt to understand the forces driving the search for evidence, leaders and laggards.

Higher Education taxation policies (federal and state). Recently completed Northeastern University dissertation on Payment-in-lieu-of-taxes. “BEYOND THE POLITICS OF PAYMENT-IN-LIEU-OF-TAXES (PILOTS: EMBRACING TOWN-GOWN PARTNERSHIPS TO BENEFIT SOCIETY”). Residential taxpayers believe that private colleges, which are legislatively exempt from paying property tax, should contribute to the shrinking tax-base of their communities by paying yearly Payments in Lieu of Taxes (PILOTs). Taxpayers view PILOTs as compensation for the municipal services colleges and their students utilize. Colleges challenge that PILOTs, as large cash layouts, threaten their financial stability. Instead, colleges prefer to invest in the community by offering local employment and bringing partnerships and in-kind services to residents. This struggle between colleges and cities is occurring not only in Massachusetts, home to 83 non-profit colleges and universities enrolling over 250,000 students, but nationwide, and internationally as well. Using Massachusetts colleges as a baseline, this study demonstrates that the payment of PILOTs limits the amount of institutional financial student assistance that colleges can award. In addition, the study examines financial partnership strategies that provide alternatives to PILOTs that may satisfy the mutual interests of elected officials, taxpayers, and colleges, and a discussion of when university-community partnerships allow for enlightened governance. A review of the current literature offers the history of PILOTs and arguments advocating either for or against PILOTs. This study attempts offers the frameworks and constructs of colleges and other stakeholders that explains the economic and societal implications of colleges PILOTs.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
My research agenda focuses on the intersection between social stratification, social policy and social determinants of health and I have on-going research projects in all three areas. Several current projects focus on examining material hardship as a measure of social stratification. Researchers are becoming increasingly interested in alternative measures of well-being such as indicators of food insufficiency, housing upkeep problems, difficulty paying bills and unmet medical needs. In one project, I explore the latent structure of measures of material hardship. In a second project, I explore how individual reports of these measures vary by the context in which the individual is embedded. Important contextual characteristics may include the economic conditions, economic policy, climate, and social policy environment and these characteristics may vary by both state and time. I am also involved in a project to examine if there is evidence of financial assistance within kin networks by examining if the debt of middle class individuals is related to the economic situation of their siblings. Using data from the Panel Study of Income Dynamics, I will investigate a series of shocks to poor siblings—that is changes in income due to changes in employment status, marital status, or health status. In terms of evaluative work in the area of social policy, I have one old and one new project. My old project, funded by the Spencer Foundation, examines the relationship between welfare receipt, length of participation and generosity of benefit level and early childhood cognitive scores using data from the Fragile Families Study. My new evaluation project (with Peter Mueser) will examine how caseload characteristics changed after Florida implemented a multi-program on-line application system in 2005. While on-line application systems may increase access for some populations, such as employed individuals, if they are accompanied by a decrease in services at state-run service centers, as they have been in Florida, they may decrease access for other populations including the elderly, those with language difficulties, and Black and Hispanic populations, groups with lower levels of internet use. Specifically, we explore the effect of moving to an on-line application system on the size of the Food Stamp caseload and how flows onto and off of the program been influenced.

Heikkila’s research interests focus on water resource governance, institutional theory and design, and the management public sector organizations. One of Heikkila’s most recent projects is an NSF-funded study examining 14 western river basins that are governed under interstate compacts. The project examines linkages across different scales of governance (local, state, regional) and how these institutional linkages relate to conflicts and cooperation over shared resources. Dr. Heikkila has also researched other forms of specialized public sector governance through a study of large-scale ecosystem management programs in four regions of the United States. This research has focused on assessing the factors that facilitated the emergence of these coordinated institutional arrangements, as well as the institutional design elements that promote learning and adaptation. Dr. Heikkila’s previous work has also compared how institutions support the development and implementation of the coordinated use of ground and surface waters in arid western states, looking at the organizational relationships among water users and agencies that administer and provide coordinated water management projects. This project led to a co-authored book, Common Waters Diverging Streams: Linking Institutions and Water Management in Arizona, California, and Colorado (with W. Blomquist and E. Schlager). Outside of the water management field, Heikkila has also applied institutional theories to studies of decision-making and performance in public sector organizations in a study funded by the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation (with K. Isett). Heikkila holds an M.P.A. and PhD from the University of Arizona, School of Public Administration and Policy (1998, 2001). In 2001 she was the recipient of Resources for the Future’s Joseph L. Fisher dissertation fellowship and was a postdoctoral research fellow at Indiana University’s Workshop in Political Theory and Policy Analysis (2001–2002) From 2002 to 2009
she was an Assistant Professor at Columbia University’s School of International and Public Affairs and is now an Associate Professor at the University of Colorado’s School of Public Affairs.

There are currently two major strands to my research. The first is examining institutional and policy change in the mature water economies (i.e., large-scale irrigation... economies) of Canada, Australia, the US, and Spain. This strand is theoretically interesting because it has led me to explore patterns of institutional change other than punctuated equilibrium and path dependency. The second strand of my research concerns climate change and GHG abatement policies. It is primarily concerned with explaining the different approaches to GHG abatement that have been taken throughout the developed world, and with explaining the nearly universal adoption of emissions trading as a primary instrument for GHG abatement.

My research involves the intersection of courts, law and public policy. I am particularly interested in the empirical examination of why and how citizens use law and the courts to change policy, and then the subsequent influence of the courts on the policy issue. My research agenda is driven by questions of why have non-accountable institutions in a democratic system, and what is their role? Courts and bureaucracies are often attacked as unresponsive and undemocratic. My work, through an examination of court influence on policy, bureaucratic responsiveness, non-electoral selection processes, and judicial decision-making, seeks to demonstrate that they are in fact, responsive and crucial to democratic government.

In the long term, I am interested in the linkages between the public, government, and public policy—particularly what government expects from citizens, what citizens expect from government, and the implications of those relationships for the public policy process. My dissertation will explore how conceptions of the public (i.e., the traditionalist and revisionist schools of thought) are a result of underlying systematic variation among individuals, and how theoretical approaches can lead to a better understanding of the nature of the public on both the individual and aggregate levels. I have also done some research on survey methodologies and experimental survey design that I will continue in the future. My working papers include projects on education policy, ideology as a construct (with a survey experiment), and how different types of primary elections affect the public.

Alan Jacobs specializes in the comparative politics of advanced industrialized democracies and in the politics of public policy, with particular emphasis on the welfare state. Jacobs’ current research, supported by grants from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the UBC Hampton Fund, seeks to explain how democratic governments make intertemporal policy tradeoffs. Specifically, he is interested in understanding the conditions under which elected governments adopt policies that have short-term costs but long-term social benefits—a type of policy choice he terms a “policy investment.” To date he has examined the politics of policy investment within the field of public pension financing in Europe and North America (focusing on Germany, Britain, the United States, and Canada). In related work-in-progress with J. Scott Matthews (Queens University), Jacobs is engaged in survey-experimental work designed to illuminate the structure of citizens’ attitudes toward policy investments in a range of policy fields. Alongside his interest in the politics of the long term, much of his work explores how boundedly rational political actors make choices in the face of massive uncertainty and causal complexity, with a focus on how ideas and cognitive structures shape decision-making. Jacobs’ prior work has focused on the comparative politics of health-care reform and on decision-making in the European Union.

My current research focuses on applied policy studies for federal, state, and local entities. This research responds to the expressed needs of a user and the results are intended to provide timely, high quality information to help inform policy and program decision making. These studies often are large, multiyear evaluations of government programs and currently (or very recently) addressed abstinence education, substance abuse intervention policies and programs, youth gang intervention and prevention programs, and an assessment of barriers to coordination of federally-supported local transportation services. Future research will continue to address expressed needs and will include evaluations of a program to develop the social and emotional competence of preschool children, and climate training workshops to aid change agents and agricultural producers with decision making with respect to drought management.

United under broad themes related to the interactions between preference formation, public opinion, and public policy, my research can be characterized as moving along two separate but related tracks. My dissertation, and the least conventional of the tracks, addresses biased assimilation processes in mass opinion, and how those processes influence preferences and perceptions of risk in the policy area of climate change. Merging two theories, Cultural Theory and narrative, my dissertation utilizes an online survey with a built in experimental design of fifteen-hundred national respondents to quantitatively address this broad question. I am also working on an empirical framework to study the influences of narratively structured communication on policy processes and outcomes. My second research track deals with a new macro-model of policy subsystem dynamics. Citing the inadequate treatment of public opinion in policy process models (particularly the ACF) and working with Hank C. Jenkins-Smith, we have produced a model of policy topography that accounts for public opinion, institutional venues, policy actors, and networked relations, as they relate to the transferring of information across policy subsystems. The policy topography model aims to better explain policy change by applying a macro-level analysis of policy subsystems via the vehicle of informational movement across subsystems.

My research agenda is best described as an exploration of American constitutional culture. The investigation of “constitutional culture” has a considerably broader scope than legal analysis; it focuses upon the ongoing dialectic between legal norms and the broader culture within which those norms are situated and must be understood. I am concerned with the operation of constitutional values in a heterodox culture, and in tracing the effects of that interaction on policy choice and contestation. Choices made by those who designed our constitutional architecture have shaped our contemporary definitions of public and private, our notions of governmental and personal responsibility, and our conceptions of human rights. They dictate the manner in which we frame civic responsibility, and allocate collective social duties among governmental, nonprofit and private actors. In short, those initial constitutional choices have become constitutive of a distinctive American culture. My research involves the exploration and explication of those connections, from the more obvious relationship between constitutionalism and public administration, to the ongoing tension between majoritarianism and individual rights, to the intersection of religion and government, to the mutual dependence of governmental and nonprofit agencies, to more subtle effects of the constitutional culture on policy areas like health and human services.

My research is inspired by contemporary problems of governance, institutional development, regulatory innovation, and comparative public policy. Working in the tradition of historical institutionalism makes visible and understandable the overarching contexts and interacting processes that shape politics and public policymaking. I explore how policies are formed and how policy actors generate new modes of interaction, which is inextricably linked to explaining the institutional configurations and policy outcomes. My current research agenda is focused on the problem of bureaucratic reorganization and environmental policy capacity in Russia. Another project seeks to explore the relationship between governmental performance in environmental policy and institutionalization and formalization of environmental groups. My next project will examine the legal, institutional, and regulatory factors... affecting water quality trading in the U.S. It will analyze how program design, institutional settings, and problems related to inadequate supply and demand have significant effects on the behavior and performance of trading programs. Still another project develops a conceptual framework for analyzing the roles different countries play in the process of globalization, which brings to light the complexity of policy conditions globalization gives rise to.

Jonathan GS Koppell is Associate Professor of Politics and Management at Yale School of Management and Director of Yale’s Working Group on Global Governance. His research concerns the design and administration of complex organizations including global rule-making bodies, public-private hybrid organizations and publicly-traded corporations. His current research focuses on the structure and management of “global governance organizations,” entities that create rules, regulations and standards that are applied around the world. His forthcoming book World Rule: The Politics of Global Governance (University of Chicago Press) examines a diverse assortment of institutions that includes, for example, the International Telecommunications Union, the Forest Stewardship Council, the World Health Organization, the Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, the International Accounting Standards Board and the International Organization for Standardization. The book offers a novel study finding commonalities among this varied population and calling attention to the unique demands of governing on a global scale. Previously, Koppell has focused on government-created entities that operate in the marketplace to achieve public policy goals. In The Politics of Quasi Government (Cambridge University Press), Koppell examines well-known hybrid companies including Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, explaining the potential pitfalls of this approach to public policy. He has extended this research beyond the United States, most recently in an article on the governance challenges for Chinese state-owned enterprises. As Director of the Millstein Center for Corporate Governance and Performance, Koppell oversaw the development of a leading research centers on this vital subject. The Center has already collaborated with leading institutions such as the OECD, Aspen Institute, International Corporate Governance Network and Oxford University to sponsor new research and gather leaders from business, government and academe to establish an agenda for improving corporate governance. Prof. Koppell holds a PhD and a MA from the University of California, Berkeley, and an AB from the Harvard College.

Work has just been completed on a book project reporting on an NSF-funded study of the U.S. Toxics Release Inventory and its effects on business and community decisionmaking. The study involves a large dataset of nationwide toxic releases and other environmental performance measures for about 8,500 American industries along with results from a national survey of 1,000 businesses that focused on their experience with the TRI program and the effect it had on their manufacturing operations as well as on relations with community groups. The book (under review with MIT Press as of fall 2009) will anchor the TRI study within the larger context of how best to appraise the potential for new environmental policy approaches, such as information disclosure. Written with Troy Abel and Mark Stephen, the book explores the broad trends in industry performance and TRI measures, seeks to explain the substantial difference among leaders and laggards, and offers some recommendations both TRI policy and environmental policy in general. During 2009, I also prepared new editions of Environmental Policy (CQ Press), co-edited with Norman Vig; Public Policy (CQ Press), co-authored with Scott R. Furlong; and Environmental Policy and Politics (Longman). The first involved a substantial change in the coverage of new topics and the addition of new authors. The second, which is a third edition of the book, kept the same chapters but updated them thoroughly and covered public policy developments through the beginning of the Obama presidency. The third also involved a substantial updating of the chapters as of fall of 2009.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
My research probes questions of public policy agenda-setting in democratic political institutions (especially Congress). It is highly varied in terms of institutional topics, but there is an intellectual core; I explore the inter-play between political institutional structure and public policy. My various projects relate to two sets of research questions. The first is, “How do democratic political institutions process policy issues?” More specifically, why are some issues seriously considered while others fall by the wayside? Projects on issue processing: a series of articles on “winnowing” in the U.S.
House and Senate. A series of articles on the effect of institutional structure on environmental policy discussions in congressional committees and the federal bureaucracy. But that (issue processing) represents only half of theoretical picture. Institutions are not static. They are not ex ante bargains struck before the game begins. They evolve, and this evolution may affect the processing of policy issues. Therefore, a second question I study is, “how and why do institutions change the way in which they process issues?”

I am currently working on three different research projects that involve varying levels of analysis. At the local government level, my coauthor and I investigate the differences/similarities between hard and soft services in terms of their contracting patterns and management in order to test the conventional economic assumptions involved in these two contrasting types of services. At the state level, I examine the implication of the recent child welfare service reform in Florida through the lens of principal-agent theory and explore the effects of two different institutional designs on controlling of agents. Lastly, my coauthors and I attempt to identify potential determinants of United Way funding allocations and test whether its much touted outcome-based funding strategy has been implemented at the local level.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
Professor Langbein teaches quantitative methods, program evaluation, policy analysis, and public choice. Her research fields include: theories of bureaucratic discretion, productivity, principal-agent models, social capital, and cooperation in the workplace; theories of influence of interest groups in Congress and the bureaucracy; empirical applications in various policy areas, including the environment, education, defense, housing, criminal justice (death penalty and police), and corruption. Her recent articles have appeared in Political Research Quarterly, Journal of Politics, Journal of Policy Analysis and Management, Social Science Quarterly, Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory, Evaluation Review, Public Choice, Public Administration Review, and other scholarly journals. She has published articles on the demand for music programs in the public schools; on the impact of cooperation among police on their productivity; on the efficiency of residential community associations; and on the comparison of negotiated to conventional rule making at the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. She is studying the consequences of varying levels of discretion in federal agencies, the measurement and equilibria of corruption in countries, and the consequence of pay for performance for the productivity of public sector employees. She has a recent article in Economics of Education Review on the link between student teaching evaluations and grade inflation. Her new textbook, Program Evaluation: A Statistical Guide, (with Claire Felbinger) was published by ME Sharpe in Sept. 2006. In January 2002, she was the Hooker Distinguished Visiting Professor at McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario. In Feb. 2006, she was the keynote speaker at the Southern Evaluation Association.

My current research looks at their response to the plight of Jews in Displaced Persons camps in Germany after WWII. I argue that their perception of themselves as Jews and Americans is often the crucial factor in their response to Jewish refugees.

My principal field is Public Policy/Political Economy, particularly in the area of labor markets and labor market policy. Much of my research has been focused on issues of wage regulation and inequality. I have written a book on the politics of the minimum wage and more recently about the political economy of the living wage. Recently, I have been exploring labor market characteristics that might predispose cities to pass such ordinances. And I have also been taking an historic view of those cities that passed ordinances, arguing that the nature of labor market transformations over the last 40 years have perhaps made them somewhat path dependent. I am continuing my work on the minimum wage with a look at the whole issue of wage contours, especially those around the minimum wage (both the statutory and effective), in terms of composition, and how those contours might vary across geographic regions. I am interested in exploring how such contours might be affected by increases in the minimum wage or other labor market policies designed to bolster wages. I have also recently begun work on a book length project focusing on the importance of wage policies to the maintenance of equality in accordance with democratic theory. I am expecting that this book will be titled Wage Policy, Income Distribution, and Democratic Theory.

Using federal personnel data, I will continue to examine the impact of race, gender, and membership in the Baby Boom generation on career patterns in the federal civil service. My research focuses primarily on politics and policymaking in urban and local governments in the United States. Most of my published work relates to the politics of land use and development in metropolitan areas, although some of my research has touched on such areas as ethnic and racial politics, political control of the bureaucracy, and the nature of policy change. My main current project is a collaborative, NSF-funded multidisciplinary study regarding the varied involvement of local police departments in the enforcement of U.S. immigration laws. Before arriving at Arizona State in 2005, I was a Research Fellow (1996–2005) and Program Director (2002–2005) at the Public Policy Institute of California, where I wrote numerous publications for applied policy audiences. I have frequently conducted elite surveys of local government officials, and have a methodological interest in this technique for ascertaining policy behaviors and orientations.

Helen Margetts is Professor of Society and the Internet at the Oxford Internet Institute (OII), a department of the University of Oxford. She is a political scientist specialising in public policy and management, particularly the relationship between government and the Internet and related technologies. She also works on electoral systems, political parties and participation. She has published numerous books and articles in these areas as well as major research and policy reports for agencies such as the UK’s National Audit Office. She has directed a number of large-scale research projects and has set up and co-directs an experimental laboratory for the social sciences at Oxford, OxLab. In 2003 she and Patrick Dunleavy won the “Political Science Making a Difference” award from the UK Political Studies Association. Professor Margetts joined the University of Oxford in 2004 from University College London where she was a Professor in Political Science and Director of the School of Public Policy. Previously she worked as a lecturer at Birkbeck College (University of London) and a research fellow at the London School of Economics and Political Science (LSE). She began her career as a computer programmer and systems analyst with Rank Xerox after receiving her BSc in mathematics from the University of Bristol. She returned to study at the LSE in 1989, completing an MSc in Politics and Public Policy in 1990 and a PhD in Government in 1996. Helen is Editor in Chief of the OII/PSO journal Policy and Internet.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
What do we do for a living, how do we experience work, and do these experiences differ between women and men? To explore these questions, I draw inspiration from multiple disciplines. My research on women in nontraditional occupations has shown how networks channel women into female-dominated, “pink collar” jobs by restricting information about training and jobs in skilled trades and crafts. My work on emotional labor draws from economic sociology and situates it in a public administration framework, as does my research on contingent work arrangements. Women are assumed to engage in emotional labor more than men do, particularly in customer service and caring professions. In contrast to the private sector, however, we find emotional labor is not gender specific. Similarly, studies of contingent work in private-sector firms have focused on “perma-tamps” who receive poor wages and few benefits. In the public sector, however, we have not found unequivocal evidence that temporary jobs are inherently exploitive. Public personnel management has only begun to notice contingent work and has neither anticipated nor recognized emotional labor. I further explore the intersection of gender and economic status in the study of minimum wages, as women are disproportionately represented in low-wage, pink-collar jobs that earn minimum or near-minimum wages. Does this ostensibly redistributive policy in fact redistribute income? And why have we found a substantial population of workers earning sub-minimum wages despite rate increases? Our work has only begun to address these issues. In the near term, I will continue to investigate the phenomenon of emotional labor, extending it to relationship-intensive federal functions such as disaster relief, veterans’ services, diplomacy, and intelligence gathering. We will also pursue our research on primary and secondary labor markets in individual federal agencies, and continue to study and assess programs and redistributive policies for the working poor.

May’s research addresses policy processes, environmental regulation, and policymaking for natural hazards and disasters. His research about policy processes concerns policy design and implementation, the coherence of policies, bureaucratic responses, and policy learning. He has recently examined the implications for policymaking and governance of widespread policy disruptions. His current research extends that investigation to consideration of messy problems that span multiple areas of policy and the challenges of creating and sustaining boundary-spanning policy regimes to address such problems.

My research interests lie at the intersection of law and policy and are concerned with criminal law, state punishment policy, and criminal justice practices. In particular, I focus on political structures and institutions—including federalism, interest groups, political mobilization and participation—and their impact on the development of criminal laws and criminal justice policy. I am especially interested in the political mobilization of racial minorities and the poor and most of my work emphasizes the relationship between these groups and punishment politics. My research crosses intra- as well as inter-disciplinary boundaries, drawing upon work in public law, public policy, American political development, criminology, and political and socio-logical theory. My current research involves exploration of urban minority mobilization around issues of crime and violence in their neighborhoods. I am also beginning a cross-national comparative project on the impact of political institutions on punishment policies.

Michael Mintrom’s previous work has explored elements of policy entrepreneurship and the diffusion of policy innovations. His studies have frequently been grounded in assessments of contemporary educational reforms in the United States. Michael is presently exploring aspects of political leadership as they influence policy and organizational design. Substantively, the focus is on local institutional structures that support engagement with the global knowledge economy. Michael has recently been exploring this cross-nationally with respect to university research partnerships. He intends to extend this analysis in the coming years to consider comparatively other local institutions and governance arrangements. The focus will be on organizational innovations that are intended to promote regional economic development. Approaches to undertaking policy analysis have also been treated as a sub-theme in Michael’s work. He intends to keep working over the coming years on documenting effective approaches to undertaking contemporary policy analysis.

My research tends to focus on the ways in which individuals and organizations fail to act in the interests of others, and the means by which such agency relationships are structured in order to overcome or tolerate agency problems. About the same time (1973) that Stephen Ross developed the economic theory of agency, I independently originated the institutional theory of agency, including many of the standard arguments and terms of use common now in social science in uses of agency theory. My work has continued to develop theory and applications of this approach.

While the substantive aspect (the Arctic) of the above publications does not reflect my current interests, the theoretical ideas continue to be of interest to me. My current work considers the role the Supreme Court has played in problem definition of various dimensions of women’s policy as compared to processes of problem definition in Congress on similar policy. In particular, I am interested in assessing this dynamic in regards to sexual harassment and child support policies. I hope to continue developing an understanding of the interplay of venue shopping and problem definition.

My main research interest concerns the study of the effectiveness of environmental policy instruments and institutions, applying behavioral, institutional economic and organizational theoretical perspectives. Research projects include analyses of farmers’ responses to environmental regulation as well as policy analyses and implementation studies regarding the EU water framework directive. The latter includes two EU-funded projects, Thresholds of environmental sustainability and EURO-LIMPACS on the impacts of global climate change on freshwater systems, where I have contributed to the development of frameworks for policy analysis. Currently the leader of the project EU agricultural policy and Danish pesticide policy which integrates economic and ecological modeling to assess the effects of different policy instruments. I teach public administration and public policy as well as environmental politics at Aarhus University.

My interests focus on place-based policies and institutions, whether local or regional, rural or urban. In particular, I am pursuing interests in the comparative study of protected areas (internationally) from an institutional standpoint, especially the limits of the American national-park model. My initial focus has been on the New York’s Adirondack Park, which deviates from the standard model. I am also interested in explaining the success or failure of neighborhood-level urban development strategies within a common-pool resource (commons) framework and, more generally, in exploring the relationship between social capital formation and the structure of local government. As well, I retain a strong interest in institutional approaches to metropolitan governance in the presence of multiple jurisdictions.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
While varied across issue areas, my substantive research interests are in the role of competing interests in the policymaking process. I have explored this theme spatially at the United Nations, Canada and the United States and in the issue areas of outer space, climate change and national parks. I am interested in how the tensions between competing interests inform and stabilize/destabilize the policymaking process. One of the key elements of democratic policymaking is the participation of organized interests. Policymakers do not operate in isolation; rather they formulate and implement policy in conjunction with organized interests. In my research I combine an institutional framework with a pluralist orientation to better study the policymaking process. Policy decision-making occurs in an arena filled with non-state actors (also called organized interests) including non-governmental organizations (NGOs), inter-governmental organizations, market-oriented actors such as corporations, and knowledge-based communities. Non-state actors play instrumental roles in policy functions such as knowledge building, policy promotion, assessment, implementation, enforcement and evaluation. The need for organized interests to work together coupled with mounting sources of tension and divergence, results simultaneously in an environment of unity and conflict. The underlying assumption of my research is that interests matter, and that the effects of interest group behaviour have social and political significance. My secondary research interest is in the use of web surveys and how web surveys can be used to create quasi-experimental research designs, and to reach new populations.

My current research project investigates state-based environmental litigation. Specifically, I am examining how state attorneys general are attempting to shape national environmental policy through the courts. Recent lawsuits filed by state attorneys general on issues such as federal fuel economy standards, mercury pollution levels, and carbon dioxide emissions suggest that state litigation is becoming an increasingly popular tool for pressuring the federal government and private industries to change their policies and practices. However, scholars have not empirically examined the nature and history of state-based environmental litigation nor assessed the policy consequences of it. My project examines all state-initiated environmental litigation against the federal government and private parties in federal courts from 1970 to the present. I pay particular attention to multi-state lawsuits aimed at changing national policy. My goals are to discover litigation patterns and trends and to consider the consequences of state environmental litigation on federal regulatory policy.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
Although I work in several subfields of American politics, my overriding concern for a number of years has been with the ability of democratic government to make intelligent policy decisions. Stated crudely, the issue is not, who wins and who loses?—the main preoccupation of behavioral political science for generations—but does government do smart things or dumb things? Of course, we can’t often make such categorical distinctions; but decisions do vary with respect to their reliance on relevant evidence, thorough analysis, careful design, and so on. I might add that this kind of concern has been easier to explain in conversation since the first year of the Iraq War, which many see as a calamitous mistake. I have addressed this general problem of intelligence in policymaking—in varying degrees of depth—in relation to processes of debate and deliberation in Congress, the competence of public opinion, advisory processes in presidential decision making, campaign debate in elections, and the influence of public opinion on policymaking. My main current project is about how American Government deliberates over one the most challenging policy dilemmas it has ever faced: the conflict between enhancing security against terrorism, on the one hand, and preserving privacy, defendants’ rights, and ultimately political freedom, on the other. In collaboration with William Bendix, a Ph.D. candidate in US politics at the University of British Columbia, I am working on a book that will analyze the development of policies about wiretapping, surveillance, detention of suspects, and related issues. I have also agreed to write a chapter on “Deliberation in Congress” for the Oxford Handbook of Congress. Finally, I am co-editing a book that compares the US and Canadian political systems and their performance in policymaking. The two countries have generally quite similar societies and cultures, at least by world standards. But they have radically different formal political institutions. Two UBC colleagues and I have assembled a distinguished group of both American and Canadian authors and expect to produce a book that will attract wide interest on both sides of the border.

My research focuses on institutional and policy choices in democracies and how these choices affect democratic performance and sustainability. This interest extends across two subfields, comparative politics and public policy, and considers fundamental problems that all democracies must confront. The first strand of my research centers on the stability of democratic regimes. I explore why, in the face of challenges from anti-system political actors, some democracies are robust while others are more fragile. My research in this area considers this problem from two perspectives. First, it considers the role of both formal and informal institutions in democratic breakdown. Second, it considers the commitment dilemma that democracies confront with their citizens over both the social contract and juridical contracts. The second strand of my research is located at the intersection of the literatures on bureaucratic responsiveness, regulatory politics and legislative studies. I am interested in the policy implications of elected officials’ manipulation of the structure and procedures of administrative agencies as a response to the delegation problem. Specifically, my research focuses on the following three questions. First, through precisely what design mechanisms do elected officials (legislators and chief executives) attempt to influence bureaucratic activity? Second, how do individual legislators attempt to intervene in agency affairs? Third, what are the consequences of manipulating institutional design features for the delivery of public policy? I explore these questions primarily in the context of environmental policy.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
My work focuses on policy design: how and why we get the kinds of policy designs that we currently observe; and what the consequences of these kinds of policies are for democracy, citizenship, and the quality of life that we experience. By policy design, I am referring to the substantive content of policy: the problem definitions, goals, benefits/burdens, target populations, rationales, social constructions, tools, rules, and the other empirical elements of policy. My colleague, Helen Ingram, and I continue to develop and use a theory of policy design that emphasizes the central role played by social constructions in understanding both the causes and consequences of policy. One central thesis is that policy making sometimes occurs (perhaps often) in conditions that are best described as “degenerative democracy” in which “winning” against ones “enemies” and inflicting a death blow to them and to their ideas is more important than solving collective problems and serving a collective and public interest. Whether this condition exists in the legislative halls of the nation’s capital or in a university department, the result is public policy that serves only political ends. Unlike the pluralist theory of democracy, the policy design / social construction theory does not hold that there is some “automatic” corrective device where citizens will rise up and change the system. Instead, the policy designs themselves thwart corrective action because of a pervasive “feedback” effect they have on political voice. Much of the focus of my recent work has been in extending the initial ideas we developed in “The Social Construction of Target Populations,” (1993), The American Political Science Review, Vol. 87, No. 2, pp. 334–346 to ascertain not only instances where the theory holds, but also exceptions to the degenerative democracy model and to learn from these exceptions how we might improve public policy making.

My current research agenda is two-pronged. The first part involves exploration of the application a state-centered model of public policy to urban policy issues. This entails original research on the impact of urban public policies on empowerment/disenpowerment of citizens who are the targets/clients of those programs as well as secondary analysis of the broad literature on urban policy and citizen participation. The second part involves ongoing analysis of policy diffusion, implementation, public opinion and policy reinvention with respect to states’ policies on eminent domain in the aftermath of the Supreme Court’s Kelo decision.

Mack Shelley’s research, external funding, and teaching focus on statistical methods and their applications to public policy and program evaluation. He has worked with funding from numerous federal agencies, state agencies, and nonprofits, including the National Science Foundation, the United States Department of Education, the Urban Mass Transportation Administration, the Iowa Department of Education, the Iowa Department of Public Health, the Des Moines Independent Community School District, the Iowa Department of Public Health, the Center for Substance Abuse Prevention, the Administration for Children and Families of the United States Department of Health and Human Services, the Iowa Department of Economic Development, the City of Des Moines, the Iowa Board of Regents, the Pew Foundation, and the American Judicature Society. His current and future work focuses on: (1) education policy, particularly as impacted by the No Child Left Behind and Education Sciences Reform Act legislation establishing canons for education research and evaluation; (2) science and technology policy, particularly regarding information technology and human-computer interaction; and (3) aging and disability policy, focused on implications for health care and social service delivery of single point of entry systems and Web-based access to information and referral resources. He also has made occasional forays into aspects of policy in other areas including transportation, environmental contamination, biotechnology, family and intergenerational care, gerontology, family businesses, and higher education administration.

My research interests are in the intersection of a set of theoretical and methodological social science issues. The theoretical puzzles in social valuation generally, and the translation of social valuation into technological and environmental choice, are of substantial and continuing interest. As a necessary component of environmental and scientific policy decision making, I have also focused extensively on theories of risk perception. The empirical underpinnings of both valuation and risk perception research are grounded in applied survey research methodologies. The specific topics of research interest include: environmental politics and policy; science and technology policy; contingent valuation methodology; policy analysis; cost benefit analysis; risk analysis and assessment; and gender and risk perception.

He is a prolific author; several of his books have been translated into foreign-languages, appearing in Arabic, Armenian, Chinese, French, Hungarian, Russian, and Spanish editions; some under the auspices of the U.S. Department of State. Although well-known as a scholar of politics and language, American political thought, political ideologies, and general American government Skidmore also has published widely in American studies and popular culture, especially regarding transportation and America’s forgotten early highways. In recent years, however, in addition to the U.S. presidency, much of his work has dealt with the politics of Social Security, Medicare, and health care in the U.S. These latter interests led him to accept the position of editor-in-chief of Poverty and Public Policy: A Global Journal of Social Security, Income, Aid, and Welfare. Art Stewart has over twenty-five years of experience across the spectrum of his profession, including sixteen years as head of his own firm. His expertise as a transformation strategist extends across several key management disciplines and is strengthened by uncommon exposure to a diversity of organizations, industries and “publics”. Art’s rich consulting experience runs the gamut—from innovative technology based start-ups and early stage ventures to mature bricks and mortar leaders as well as venerable non-profit and cause related institutions. Recognized as an effective problem solver, he has attracted a diverse array of organizations as clients—most of whom are leaders in their respective domains. His professional endeavors have taken him to the forefront of the green/sustainability movement and in the management of stakeholder issues and social responsibility since the early 1990’s. He serves on the Thought Leader Advisory Panel of the Center for Consumer Research at the Haub School of Business at Saint Joseph’s University. Art earned a mid-career (2008) Master’s in Policy Management from Georgetown University’s Public Policy Institute as well as a postgraduate certificate in Senior Executive Leadership, also from Georgetown. He holds an undergraduate degree in Mass Communications from Emerson College and has completed “Dealing with an Angry Public,” with the MIT-Harvard Law School Public Disputes and Negotiation Program. His professional achievements have earned Art inclusion in Who’s Who in America, Who’s Who in Business & Finance, and Who’s Who in the Media & Communications.

I am interested in developing a typology or framework that helps us make better sense of the myriad of activities through which American governments at the local, state, and national levels address children and their welfare. Existing policy typologies and frameworks do not seem to apply well to “children-related public policies” such as public schooling, custody arrangements (adoption, foster care, kinship care, child support, etc.), juvenile justice processes and procedures, youth curfews, provision of day care, tax deductions for dependent children, etc.

The second research interest is public management and inter-organizational networks—more in particular the relation between network embeddedness of organizations and their performance. A major funded interdisciplinary research project concerns “the implementation of policy innovations in organizations” and integrates sociological research on policy implementation with psychological research on occupational health and employee performance. Applications are in various areas of public service delivery.

I am continuing the research published in Nuclear Waste Stalemate: Political and Scientific Controversies. The recent decision of President Obama to stop work on the Yucca Mountain repository has reopened all policy options. Reprocessing is being considered as well as other locations for a permanent repository. Meanwhile the nuclear waste is being stored at the reactor sites. The waste produced in nuclear reactors, often referred to as spent fuel, remains radioactive for hundreds of thousands of years. The scientific problems are related to the difficulty of isolating spent fuel from the water supply and the political problems involve the resistance of residents of potential storage locations to storing the waste. Although my emphasis has been on the situation in the U. S. I plan to continue my research on efforts of foreign nuclear power users to deal with their spent fuel. Thus far, no country has solved this problem although Finland is making significant progress on developing an underground repository.

I continue to work on various aspects of global climate policy, including the architecture of a post-Kyoto framework that takes into account the demands of climate justice as well more local approaches that aim to reconstruct the norms that structure individual greenhouse gas emissions-related behavior. My next book project is on individual responsibility for climate change, and I intend to complete most of the work for it in 2010.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
Current and future research projects follow two tracks: (1) Organizational behavior and management: here I further investigate advanced aspects of organizational politics, especially in the public sector, and potential explanatory models for its emergence and consequences. I also focus on the meaning of organizational citizenship behavior (OCB), especially its dark side of Compulsory OCB, innovation and change in public organizations, as well as behavior in this environment. My goal is to explore the effect of these behaviors on performance and affectivity, both at the individual and organizational levels. Another track is to advance knowledge on the comparative prospects for the private and the public sectors; (2) Public administration and politics: here I intend to focus on trust and satisfaction of citizens and their impact on public policy and on political behavior and involvement. I try to explore citizens’ role in governance, citizens’ participation in politics and in public administration activity, collaboration among the three sectors (private, public, and third sector), citizens’ attitudes towards governments and their relationship with democratic mechanisms both in the federal, state, and the local level. In this area I examine the behaviors of both citizens and public personnel under dynamics of change and reforms in modern nations.

My work focuses primarily on policy design and local capacity building for emergency management and Homeland Security. The sociopolitical, as well as legal, environment is one in which authority is fragmented, resources are dispersed, and capacities are uneven. It is an environment that requires intergovernmental, inter-sector, and inter-organizational collaboration. Disasters, including terrorism-related disasters, also require considerable flexibility and improvisation. Identifying mechanisms that encourage effective collaboration at the organizational level and the skill-set that supports collaboration at the individual level is the goal.

Substantively, I am interested in the question: How can we organize the governance of medicine to integrate appropriately values, interests, and expertise? My current efforts to answer this question involve a study of decision making within the Organ Procurement and Transplantation Network, an organization that engages in private rule-making. I also have a long-standing interest in policy craft. Most recently this interest has led me to the question of whether or not the wider application of cost-benefit analysis would promote better social policy. A volume, co-edited with Aidan Vining, addressing this question based on a project done for the MacArthur Foundation will be published next year by Georgetown University Press. In addition to these ongoing interests, I am engages in health services research looking at the impact of health report cards and racial disparity in access to quality health care, the social and fiscal impacts of early detection and treatment of Alzheimer’s disease, and the proper accounting for addiction in cost-benefit analysis. An empirical effort employing contingent valuation methods to relate the willingness-to-pay of smokers to eliminate addiction to the “unaddicted” demand schedule for cigarettes will appear this year in Health Economics. Finally, I am interested in how we can design institutions to promote better the use of evidence policy making.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
I work at the nexus of comparative public policy, women and politics, and political theory. Theoretically, my work explores the role of social movements, bureaucracies and elected officials in representing historically disadvantaged constituencies in democratic policy processes. Empirically, I focus on the effect of these modes of political representation on public policy outcomes, especially policies of importance to advancing gender, race and class equality. I have special expertise in policies addressing violence against women, policies affecting women’s work, and in living wage policies and other policies affecting working poor people in the United States. I have examined the relationship between social movements, public bureaucracies and public policies at a local, state, national and even international level. My work is distinguished by my use of both qualitative and quantitative methods. I use both large-scale, cross-national comparisons, using statistical methods as well as more qualitative field research methods employing intensive analysis of primary documents and artifacts and interviewing. I am currently working on two books, one with Mala Htun, tentatively entitled When and Why do Governments Promote Women’s Rights? which is in progress. This co-authored book is a global comparative study of women’s rights. I am also beginning a new book project entitled _Inequality and the State_, that examines the ways that race, class and gender combine in processes of social policy formation. The project examines cross-national variation in welfare states, looking at the patterns of variation in social policies that are chiefly distributive in nature (income assistance, old-age pensions) and comparing them to cross-national patterns of variation for those that are non-distributive, focused more on physical security, legal rights and/or societal recognition (violence against women, multiculturalism). I am also working on an article on strategies for building solidarity in transnational social movements.

My work has focused on federal budgeting policy and politics, health policy and politics both in the U.S. and across the advanced industrial democracies, and entitlement or social insurance policy and politics in the United States. One theme of my work is to be careful about the scale of effects: for example, the econometric evidence about the relationship between budget balances and economic growth does not support strong policy prescriptions. Another is to define problems carefully: thus the health care costs associated with population aging in the U.S. are much greater if you focus on our federal budget than on society, which is an artifact of having Medicare and Medicaid but not having national health insurance. A third is to recognize limitations on knowledge and institutional capacity: my work on health care cost control emphasizes that many trendy ideas require technology or institutions that don’t exist, while price regulation is much more practical on both dimensions. Currently I am working a bit on international health policy comparisons, some on issues related to national health insurance reform in the U.S., and on a book about health care cost control.

My research focuses on the intersection between political participation, immigration policy, and state and local politics. In particular, my dissertation examines the processes of contemporary immigrant political incorporation in the United States, particularly in smaller cities for which immigration is a new phenomenon. Unlike some other immigrant-receiver nations, the United States lacks a uniform immigrant incorporation policy. Federal immigration policy specifies conditions of entry, while naturalization policy specifies conditions of citizenship. In between these milestones, immigrants and the states and localities where they settle must negotiate their own systems of interaction, which in turn influence subsequent incorporation. Examining new immigrant destinations offers unique insight into the nascent development of local immigrant-related policies and their role in shaping how immigrants become members of the polity. By analyzing the interaction between policy responses and immigrant incorporation in four new immigrant destinations, I intend to improve understanding of contemporary political incorporation processes and, ultimately, to suggest what localities can do to ease immigrants’ transition from uncertain newcomers to political actors. Future work will consider national immigrant incorporation policies in comparative perspective and include targeted mixed-method evaluations of particular immigrant incorporation efforts. More broadly, my on-going research agenda will continue to probe interrelations between social structure and policy.

I have just completed a book with Stuart Soroka, entitled Degrees of Democracy (Cambridge University Press, 2010), that examines public responsiveness to policy and the representation of public preferences in policy across a range of domains in the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom. The book demonstrates that representative democratic government works surprisingly well, although there is substantial variation in responsiveness and representation. Most importantly, there are significant differences owing to the public salience of different domains and the design of governing institutions themselves—specifically, federalism (versus unitary government) and presidentialism (versus parliamentarism). I also am editing a book with Peter Enns, entitled Who Gets Represented? (under contract with Russell Sage Foundation), that addresses representational inequality in the United States. The volume focuses on: (a) the degree to which preferences for policy actually differ across groups in the US, and (b) how the evident differences in preferences matter for policy itself, i.e., whether some opinions are better represented than others. The chapters reveal that there is substantial similarity in preferences across groups and that, even where differences exist, the preferences of those in the middling and upper socioeconomic status are strikingly similar. Most of the chapters also show that policymakers are more responsive to the preferences of the middle and upper strata than those at the bottom. The finding is not surprising given the patterned similarities in public preferences and the electoral importance of the median voter.

Dustin Woods is a doctoral student in Political Science at the University of Oklahoma. He received a BA in Political Science, with a minor in Botany, from the University of Oklahoma (2008). His studies have focused on Science and Technology, Environmental, and Public Opinion and Policy. Dustin is a graduate affiliate with the Center for Applied Social Research at OU, where he actively participates in a range of funded research projects. His current research agenda is concerned with environmental policy focusing on scientists’ willingness to be policy advocates.

My research interests center on the bureaucracy, congressional-bureaucratic interactions, and the role of public administration in policy making. My current projects examine the role of bureaucracy in agenda setting in the administrative state, congressional attention to bureaucracy, and how policy makers and bureaucrats cope with and interact under uncertainty in policy making. I am currently finishing a manuscript tentatively titled Economizing Attention: Agenda Setting and the Influence of Bureaucracy in American Politics. A separate project, “Attention, Politics, or Performance? Explaining Congressional Attention to the Bureaucracy”, examines sources of variation in congressional attention to federal agencies and programs over time.

I continue to be concerned with the communication of policy meanings, both the methods and tools of communication and the substantive meanings, the latter in certain policy issue areas. Current research extends the earlier analysis of US race-ethnic categories in public policy and administrative practices to The Netherlands, and the EU beyond that, in the context of “migration” and “integration” policies. Other work looks at policy frames/framing and frame analysis; state research regulation policies and practices (e.g., US IRBs); science museums and the idea of “science”; insider/outsider research relationships; and reflective practice.

Current Research Agenda and Future Expectations:
I am working right now on a research paper entitled “Political Division and Democratization in the Middle East.” A small description on the project: When we look to the legislative elections in Lebanon, The Palestinian Authority, and Iraq. These elections, rather than creating conditions of stability and political harmony, accelerated their societies’ entrance into to conflict and political rivalry, setting the stage for intense fighting and outbidding. Although the touted paradigm of democratic transition claims to guarantee peace and stability, it appears difficult, if not impossible for political entities in the Middle East, even the ones which have seemingly adhered to the standards of democratization, to attain peace and stability. The strange paradox present in the three latter cases is that the need for democracy is supposed to rise higher than degrees of division and unity. It is believed to be able to moderate the positions of the involved parties, spurring them to re-draft both evaluations and calculations, ultimately leading them to consensus, and even perhaps compromise.
The exact opposite, however, happened in these cases.

past president of the Society for Risk Analysis. Her research and teaching spans transportation, energy and water infrastructure, which she has approached from the perspectives of the environment, climate change, natural hazards, social justice, risk and security. Future research will be directed toward integrating competing needs for public infrastructure services in order to achieve co-benefits among environmental, security, and performance needs and interests.
